What is pulmonary rehabilitation?

When you have a chronic lung disease, you can find it increasingly difficult to move about and do your normal daily activities without getting breathless. Pulmonary rehabilitation aims to help you cope with your breathlessness and to feel stronger and fitter.

Breathlessness can be frightening. Just one bad experience can cause people to avoid situations where they might become breathless, reducing the amount of activity they do. This can slowly cause weakness, tiredness and even more breathlessness.

Pulmonary rehabilitation can help to prevent this through exercise and education.

How does pulmonary rehabilitation help?

Pulmonary rehabilitation should:

- Improve your exercise ability. You may find yourself walking further, finding day-to-day activities such as washing, dressing and shopping easier. You are likely to feel less tired too.
- Help you cope with your breathlessness. It is very frightening to become breathless and pulmonary rehabilitation should help you to manage your breathlessness and have more control.
- Increase your muscle strength and endurance, improve co-ordination and increase your understanding of your breathlessness. However, it is unlikely to change your lung function as measured by a Spirometer.
- Increase your knowledge and understanding of your lung condition and the best way to manage your symptoms.

What happens during pulmonary rehabilitation?

In Dudley, the pulmonary rehabilitation programme consists of an initial assessment for us to gain a “baseline” measure of your ability. The course then runs twice a week for a period of six weeks. There are approximately 12 people in a class.

Each session consists of a warm up for five to ten minutes, supervised exercises such as cycling, walking and a circuit with weights (you will not be expected to do anything that you are unable to do), followed by a cool down for five minutes.

The exercise session is completed with guided relaxation.

Education

After each exercise session we cover an educational topic, including:

- How the lungs work and what can go wrong
- Airway clearance techniques
- Benefits of exercise
- Managing breathlessness
- Benefits
- Travel
- Coping with lung disease
- Medication education
- Dietary advice

If you are interested in attending and haven't already been referred, please speak with your GP or practice nurse who can refer you.
